

How can the Bloomsbury Centre help you?

We can help you to apply for Wellcome Trust clinical or non-clinical fellowships in international health, if you follow these steps

Check the Wellcome Trust website to see the types of fellowship available

Check whether you are eligible for a fellowship

If you are eligible for a PhD research training fellowship, think about what kind of research project you would like to do, and approach academic staff members who share your interests at one or more of our partner institutions in London or overseas, with a view to identifying a potential supervisor. Check the list of potential supervisors at our London-based institutions, their areas of research interest can also be seen on the Policy Group profiles.

Once you have decided on a field of research, identified a supervisor, and established your application time line you can contact the Centre, who will advise you on policy group deadlines and procedures.

All candidates applying for Wellcome Trust fellowships who apply through the Bloomsbury Centre will be expected to present their research proposal and CV to our Policy Group before the deadline for submission to the Trust. You will be expected to have a nearly completed proposal by the time you make your presentation. The policy group consists of academics covering a wide range of disciplines from our London-based institutions, who will provide feedback designed to strengthen your application.

Policy group meetings are held three times a year. You should check the Wellcome Trust deadline date for the particular fellowship you are applying for, as dates and preliminary application requirements vary. You should plan to present your proposal to our Policy Group at least 2 months before the submission deadline, to allow yourself time to make any changes suggested by the group.
